THE GIRL IN THE

The suburbs are hell. That's what the movies keep telling us. Perfect nuclear families living in their McMansions are often anything but perfect. It's not exactly new cinematic territory, but it's a well that gets tapped often because it's just a lot of fun to watch rich families implode, often of their own doing. In that vein, the new suburban-set thriller "The Girl in the Pool," from director Dakota Gorman and screenwriter Jackson Reid Williams, breaks no new ground. But with its many twists and turns, it is indeed a lot of fun.

One-time teen idol Freddie Prinze Jr. plays the family patriarch Tom, a businessman who, while still handsome, feels past his prime. Tom is celebrating his birthday and is soon meant to meet his wife Kristen (Monica Potter) for dinner at a fancy restaurant. He's left work early to get ready and is surprised by a visit from his much younger mistress, Hannah (Gabrielle Haugh).

Their tryst in the family pool quickly becomes a murder scene, and the audience is at first led to believe Tom is the culprit as he attempts to both clean up the mess and hide her corpse from the guests attending a surprise party organized by his wife and their adult kids Alex (Tyler Lawrence Gray) and Rose (Brielle Barbusca). Although we're firmly planted in Tom's psyche as he re-hashes their afternoon delight and its grisly aftermath, the choppy flashbacks are careful not to reveal exactly who did the deed and why the woman was murdered.

Pressure from the party mounts. Partygoers keep getting too close to where Tom has stashed away his body. He's harassed by his father-in-law, William (Kevin Pollak, charmingly acerbic), who makes it clear that Tom and Kristen's marriage has been on the rocks for a while. Another unexpected visitor pushes Tom to his limits. As Tom spirals into a frantic drug-induced paranoia state, the film adds twist after twist until the entire family has blood on their hands.

Gorman playfully switches perspectives in one scene, pulling back from a claustrophobic ultra-close-up of Tom to a wide shot of Alex, Rose, and her boyfriend watching Tom as he pitifully stumbles around the backyard. It's a refreshing reminder that not only are we watching a movie, but also that Tom, the character, is so deep in his own world that it's like he's in his own movie as well. It's a pity, then, that Gorman's direction isn't always this razor-sharp, as there is a current of mordant humor throughout Williams' script that could easily have made this whole affair a pitch-black comedy.

Uneven characterization of the women

Freddie Prinze Jr. as Tom: Prinze Jr. delivers a standout performance as Tom, the beleaguered family patriarch whose life spirals out of control during what was supposed to be a celebratory evening. His portrayal of a man who is both desperate and delusional is both compelling and tragic. His willingness to show signs of aging and vulnerability adds a layer of authenticity to his character.

Monica Potter as Kristen: Potter brings a steely gravitas to her role as Kristen, Tom's wife. Her performance hints at a deeper backstory and underlying tensions within the marriage. While her character may seem like a stock figure at times, Potter's portrayal adds depth and complexity.

Gabrielle Haugh as Hannah: Haugh plays Tom's much younger mistress, whose sudden death sets the plot in motion. Although her character is somewhat underwritten, Haugh's presence and performance add an element of mystery and intrigue to the film.

Tyler Lawrence Gray as Alex: Gray portrays Alex, Tom's son, with a mixture of aloofness and vulnerability. His character becomes more central as the plot progresses, culminating in a third-act twist that places him at the heart of the action.

Brielle Barbusca as Rose: Barbusca plays Rose, Tom's daughter, who is reduced to a pastiche of Gen-Z stereotypes. Despite the limited material, Barbusca's performance brings some humor and relatability to the character.

Kevin Pollak as William: Pollak shines as William, Tom's acerbic father-in-law. His interactions with Tom add both tension and comic relief to the narrative.

Dakota Gorman's Direction: Gorman's direction is both visually captivating and emotionally resonant. She skillfully switches perspectives and uses a mix of close-ups and wide shots to build tension and convey the characters' psychological states. However, there are moments where the direction could have been sharper to fully capitalize on the script's mordant humor.

Cinematography: The film's cinematography effectively captures the suburban setting and the claustrophobic atmosphere of the family home. The use of lighting and camera angles enhances the suspense and drama, making the audience feel both intrigued and uneasy.

Deceit and Secrets: The film explores the theme of deceit, focusing on the hidden lives and secrets of its characters. It delves into the dark underbelly of suburban life, revealing the facade of perfection that hides deeper issues.

Family Dynamics: "The Girl in the Pool" examines the complexities of family relationships, particularly the strained marriage between Tom and Kristen. The interactions between family members are fraught with tension, adding depth to the narrative.

Psychological Thriller Elements: The movie blends elements of drama, mystery, and thriller, keeping the audience guessing about the true nature of the crime and the motivations behind it. The psychological unraveling of Tom adds an intense layer to the story.
